

Computer Keyboard

Contributed by Doug Williams
Tuesday, 29 August 2006

A computer can't do anything until you tell it what to do. This is accomplished by giving it commands and directions. This is often achieved by use of a keyboard or mouse. The keyboard is an essential part of any computer, and you will be having a hard time using one without it. When looking for a computer keyboard, you might be surprised at the number of different models from which you can choose, as well as the number of different features each one may have. The prices can range for six dollars to thirty dollars and up.

The cheaper models of computer keyboard will have the basics. This is all you need if you are looking for something inexpensive. You will have all of your keys, as well as a number pad, and the F keys. Other models will be egomaniacally correct. This is an essential for someone who spends a lot of time at his or her computer. They are popular with writers, and those who are in the administrative assistant type position at work. These make sure your wrists do not twist in an unnatural position, and they keep your arms feeling comfortable.

A higher end computer keyboard will have a lot of bells and whistles. This will be something to get if you really love shortcuts and you are always pressed for time. There are extras on these keyboards designed to make your life easier. This type of computer keyboard will have short cuts for many of the programs you use on a daily basis on your computer. Programs will open at the touch of a button, and you don't have to mess with your mouse to get them open. This type of computer keyboard may also have a sound control for your speakers, and other neat features.

When shopping for a computer keyboard, have a look online to see what you can find. You can either purchase your computer keyboard when you find the right one, or just use what you see as a guide for what you want to find when you go to the store. As with any piece of equipment, you may want to look into durability when you are buying a computer keyboard. Some will take spills and keep on working, while others will be rendered useless. You should always be careful with your computer keyboard, but accidents may happen. Look for a model that will take the bumps and bruises you and your family may dish out.